This chapter presents an overview of immunological aspects of reproduction. The evolution by the vertebrates of an efficient immune system poses a number of problems for successful reproduction. With internal fertilization, the ejaculate is deposited within the female genital tract. Internal fertilization is not restricted to mammals; all terrestrial vertebrates and many aquatic ones have adopted it. Various forms of spontaneous autoimmunity to sperm are known, ranging from antispermatozoal ...

Summary. The alpaca, Lama pacos, does not have regular oestrous cycles, but oestrus lasts for 21 to 36 days during the breeding season. Ovulation is induced by coitus. Follicular ovulation rupture occurs spontaneously 26 hr after coital stimulation and can be induced by a single injection of hcg. The low fertility observed in this species is considered to be due to low sperm production in the ...

Ethical aspects of human reproduction 4 Introduction Life depends on the presence of DNA and its family of genes. The process of reproduction makes it possible for living beings to transmit their genes to the next generation of life. There are essentially two types of reproduction: asexual reproduction, which requires only one parent,
