Once cooperation became an established feature of hominin life, cooperation based on individual benefit would indeed build the conditions that make cultural group selection effective. For as noted earlier, high-volume, high-fidelity social learning (itself a form of cooperation) tends to suppress phenotypic variation within groups and enhance phenotypic variation across groups. Given this, it ...

There is only competition and conflict. When you settle for peace, you lose sight of how the world is evolving and immediately place yourself at a disadvantage. Regardless of whether or not peace is attainable, a change in how we understand and perceive the conflict continuum requires a change in how we model military operations. This gets back to my previous point on the legacy mental models ...
