built. I plan to take this knowledge and pass this on to my own children someday, whenever I decide it is time to take that next step forward with my life.

My mother worked as a social worker and my father was a police officer. They raised me and my siblings in an extremely value-oriented household. I was taught from an early age to respect others and also to respect authority. My parents also raised me with a deeply-held belief in social responsibility. It was not enough for my family and for me to live in the world without actively causing harm to anyone. I also needed to do something that bettered my community and improved the world around me. As a result of these teachings from my parents, my two brothers followed in my father's footsteps and became police officers for the city of New York.

However, I wanted to do something different with my life and my career than the rest of my family. I had just enough of a rebellious streak in me that I felt it was necessary to leave home and try something new. However, this rebellious tendency was not enough for me to let go of the values my parents had taught me. As a result, my career choice was to join the military, which is a value-oriented career but one that was very different from anything my parents or siblings had ever done. I thought the military was a perfect choice for me, since I could expand on my existing skills and beliefs while seeing new places and experiencing all kinds of new things.

For my first year after basic training, however, I felt that joining the Write these reflections -- without worrying about spelling, grammar and if they really make sense -- on a blank word processing document or in a journal. Reread your reflections and decide which you would like to include in your paper. Create a timeline that maps your story out from the beginning to end. Place each of these events along the timeline. Reread the timeline and determine if there are any unnecessary details you need to remove, or if there are events you need to include to make ...
