In the near term, the stronger Serbia's influence over northern Kosovo is, the more that territory will integrate with Pristina; and the more Serbia pulls back, the more the North will maintain its independence from Kosovo. The clearest example of this paradox is Serbia's plan to pass a constitutional law transferring its governing authority over Serbian municipalities to what it calls the "provisional institutions" in its "autonomous province" of Kosovo. Pristina would surely ...

Kosovo and the Challenge of Humanitarian Intervention ...

On February 17, 2008, Kosovo formally declared independence. Serbia, backed by Russia, called the declaration illegal. Serbs living in Kosovo largely opposed Kosovar independence as well; they soon elected their own assembly as a direct challenge to Kosovo's new constitution, which took effect in June.

Kosovo - Self-declared independence | Britannica

The ambitions of the new Kosovo authorities to join Albania pose a challenge to the territorial integrity of Ukraine. The Russian leadership will have another argument for refusing to return Crimea to Ukraine, where an illegal referendum on self-determination was also held. The idea of joining Russia is quite popular among Donbas separatists. The head of the "DPR" Denis Pushilin considers the entry of the unrecognized republic into the Russian Federation as an ideal option. Former head ...
