The halo effect is one of the most common errors in a performance appraisal. This happens when an appraiser generalises one of the employee's traits and extends it to all the other aspects under review. For example: one person in the team always hits their sales targets and exceeds expectations year after year. During the evaluation, their manager's judgement may be clouded by this and they rate the employee as excellent in all aspects, without carefully examining their results in other ...

Probably the most common error with calculators is simply forgetting to switch between degrees and radians (or not understanding the need to switch). Degrees are often used in engineering and science classes, but radians are almost always used in calculus and higher math classes. That's because most of the formulas involving trigonometric functions come out much simpler with radians than with degrees -- the formulas for the derivatives, for the power series expansions, etc.
