Inscribed cuneiform artifacts catalogued by the CDLI number nearly 350,000 individual pieces. While those tagged as "Royal/Monumental" number just 20,000, they assume a disproportionately large role in history, literature, and linguistics in the several sub-fields of cuneiform studies. Building, historical, or votive inscriptions mentioning royal personages are found not just on tablets of clay, stone, or precious metals, but also on clay tags, bricks, nails, cones, cylinders, and prisms ...

Students looking for a solid print source for Sumerian primary texts can turn to K. Volk's A Sumerian Reader [Pontificio Istituto Biblico; Small PJ4014 .V65 1997]. The reader contains 44 texts ranging from royal inscriptions to legal and economic documents, though it does not include any literary texts. The reader—a slim 110 pages—is packed with helpful resources for the elementary student: texts, transliterations, a sign list, phonological charts, and glossaries for vocabulary ...

Royal inscriptions represent a special genre within the heritage of ancient Mesopotamia. On the one hand, they were identified already in the early days of Assyriology as being of historical value, which, in most cases, led to their immediate publication. The great majority of such inscriptions, on the other hand, come from illicit excavations.

Epigraphy - Epigraphy - Ancient Mesopotamia: Surviving epigraphic matter from the 3rd and early 2nd millennia bce includes both historical and quasi-historical material. The Sumerian king list is a compilation of names, places, and wholly fabulous dates and exploits, apparently edited to show and promote time-hallowed oneness of kingship in the face of the splintered city-states of the period.
