This excellent little book brings to modern readers the charming (but out-of-print) account of the time that Betsy Balcombe (aged 14), daughter of the William Balcombe, purveyor of supplies to the island of St Helena during the Emperor's exile, spent with Napoleon. On arriving on the island of St Helena on 15 October, 1815, Napoleon found that the refurbishment of his intended place of confinement, Longwood House, was not complete, and so rather than reside in the 'goldfish bowl' of ...

Considering the natural interest aroused by the story of the Emperor and the gamine (including many novels, children's books and even projected movies about the incident), readers interested in Napoleon's stay on St. Helena will want to own a copy of this book. Ravenhall has given us an excellent new addition of Betsy Balcombe's charming (and sometimes surprisingly insightful) memoirs of her youthful friendship with the exiled Napoleon. French historian Marcel Dunan called these memoirs "one ...

> These all have such similar facial features that standard models must have been sent out from Rome, in a coordinated attempt to spread the emperor's image to his subjects. They all adopt an idealising, youthful style that echoes the classical art of fifth-century BCE Athens and makes a glaring and loaded contrast with the craggy, elderly, wrinkled, exaggerated 'realism' that is ...
